An endemic disease, prevalent in the States of Michoacán and Guerrero, Mexico, under this name, in the States of Tabasco and Chiapas, under the names of tiña and m. de las manchas; and in Colombia and parts of Venezuela, where it is called carate. It is a kind of psoriasis, and appears under the form of small, gradually increasing, hard and generally rough spots of four different colors, of which the black and blue varieties are counted as epidermic, while the red and white spots are subepidermic and are accompanied by deep-seated lesions of the skin. The disease is most frequent in the States of Michoacán and Guerrero, where it is even considered a mark of distinction by the afflicted persons, and is said to have prevailed extensively after the eruption of the newly formed volcano Jorullo in 1759, but it was known in a sporadic form at the time of the conquest by Cortés. Although the spots are apt to appear on the whole body, they are more frequent on the face, thorax, arms, and hands, but seldom invade both sides of the body in a uniform manner. They show a slight elevation at the borders with gradually increasing desquamation, and are sometimes dry and at others humid and glutinous to the touch. In the earlier stages the disease is said to be curable ; in the later stages it is incurable, although seldom fatal. Opinions are divided about its contagiousness, but it doubtless is hereditary. It is generally conceded to be of parasitic origin. [E. Martínez, "Gac. ofic. de Michoacán," Mar. 9, 1890 (a, 14).]—M. del sol (Sp.). Pellagra. [Ziegler (a, 34).]—M. del valle (Sp.). MALIC ACID, n. Mal'i2k. Fr., acide malique. Ger., Aepfelsäure. Syn.: hydroxysuccinic acid. A dibasic acid, $C_4H_6O_5 = \left\{ {}^{CH_2C\text{——}O.OH}_{CH\,(OH)\text{——}CO.OH} \right.$, forming four-sided shining acicular crystals, or crystals of cauliflower appearance, or bushy or nodular masses. There are two isomeric varieties: (1) Natural or optically active m. a., which occurs in many acid vegetable juices, as those of sour apples, unripe grapes, quinces, etc. Its dilute solution rotates the plane of polarization to the left; if the solution contains 34 per cent. of acid, it becomes inactive; a stronger solution deviates the plane of polarization to the right. A solution containing 60 per cent. of acid thus deviates the plane to the right as much as one containing 8⅔ per cent. does to the left. (2) Inactive or artificial m. a., prepared artificially from succinic acid. It has no effect on the polarized beam. M. a. has a strong but pleasant acid taste, is very soluble in water, and melts at about 100° C. A m. a. obtained from fumaric acid is less deliquescent than common m. a., and crystallizes in hard crusts of microscopic prisms. [B, 4 ; B, 3 (α, 38).]

MANGANE (Fr.), n. Ma^{3}n^2-ga^{3}n. See MANGANESE.

MANGANESE, n. Ma^{2}n'ga^{2}n-es. For deriv., see under MAGNESIUM. Lat., manganum, manganesium, manganium. Fr., manganèse, mangane. Ger., Mangan, Braunsteinmetall. Sp., manganesio [Sp. Ph.]. A metallic element, first isolated in the latter part of the eighteenth century. It occurs in nature chiefly in the form of the black oxide. M. resembles cast-iron in color, appearance, and physical properties, being very hard and brittle. Its sp. gr. is 8·0. It melts at a white heat; thrown into warm water, it decomposes the water with evolution of hydrogen. It is readily attacked by chemical agents, becoming oxidized whenever exposed to the air, and dissolving in all dilute acids. In composition, m. acts as a bivalent radicle, forming manganous compounds; as an apparently trivalent radicle, forming manganic compounds; and as a quadrivalent radicle in the dioxide and related compounds. It is probable, however, that in reality m. is in almost all its compounds either quadrivalent or sexvalent. Symbol, Mn; atomic weight, 54·8. MEMBRANA (Lat.), n. f. Me^{2}m-bra(bra^3)'na^3. See MEMBRANE.—Artificial m. tympani. Fr., membrane tympanique artificielle. Ger., künstliches Trommelfell. One of the devices for replacing the m. tympani when it is perforated or destroyed (as by long-continued suppuration of the middle ear), and so improving the hearing. These artificial drum-heads are made of a number of different substances, are introduced through the external auditory canal as far as the plane of the absent drum-head, and may be worn continuously, or, in the case of some of the modifications, require to be frequently renewed. The use of the artificial drum-head is mentioned by Bauzer in 1640, Autenrieth in 1815. and Itard, Delean, and Linke in 1845. In 1848 Yearsley and in 1849 Erhard proposed, independently of each other, the introduction of a ball of wadding as far as the remnant of the m. tympani. In 1852 Toynbee constructed the artificial m. tympani which bears his name. Toynbee's apparatus consists of a round India-rubber plate, 6 or 7 millimetres in diameter, which is fixed on the end of a silver wire corresponding in length to the meatus. Burkhardt's modification consists of a rubber plate fixed on a solid strip of India-rubber instead of on a metal wire. Hartmann's apparatus is made of a slender piece of fish-bone, 5 centimetres long and 2 millimetres broad ; one end of the bone is bent backward 1 centimetre, and, in common with its long part, wound round with wadding. Lochner's modification of Toynbee's membrane consists of a plate securely united to the wire, the centre of the plate being fixed between two little rings which are formed by the silver wire terminating in a double spiral. Lucæ's membrane is also a modification of Toynbee's, and consists of a plate fixed on a thin India-rubber tube. Politzer's is another modification of Toynbee's membrane ; it is made by joining it with a stapes bone taken from a dead body, and is used in cases in which the crura have been destroyed by erosion, and only the base of the stapes is present in the fenestra ovalis. It is introduced so that the stapes, fastened by a thread to the India-rubber plate, is made to lie in the niche of the fenestra ovalis. [F, 3.]—Connectens m. An old term for the decidua. The margin of the membrane is imbedded in the sulcus tympanicus of the tympanic ring. Its form varies between the elliptic, the irregularly oval, and the heart-shaped. Its inclination depends on its relations to the walls of the external meatus. Its size depends on the circumference of the inner extremity of the meatus. It is closely united at the umbo with the extremity of the handle of the malleus. Microscopically, it consists of three principal layers: (1) an external dermic layer, which is a continuation of the lining membrane of the external meatus, and consists of several strata of pavement epithelium with a Malpighian mucous layer and only a very slight stratum of connective tissue; (2) a middle fibrous layer, the lamina (or substantia propria), which consists of two lamellæ, an external radiating layer, and an internal circular layer; and (3) an internal layer, a continuation of the lining membrane of the tympanic cavity, consisting of a very scanty stratum of connective tissue with a covering of non-ciliated pavement epithelium. This membrane serves for the reception of the waves of sound coming through the external auditory canal, and assists in their conduction toward the auditory nerve. [F, 32.]—M. tympaniformis. See Tympaniform MEMBRANE.—M. tympani secundaria [Scarpa]. A m. which closes the fenestra ovalis. It is concave toward the tympanum, convex toward the cochlea. It consists of three layers—the external or mucous, derived from the mucous lining of the tympanum; the internal or serous, from the lining membrane of the cochlea; and an intermediate or fibrous layer.

In some epidemics children are chiefly attacked, in others young adults, in still others adults approaching middle life. In many of its visitations it has been confined to prisons, workhouses, and garrisons. It is initiated by a chill, with subsequent prostration, vomiting, and rise of temperature, intense headache, often associated with vertigo, eventual delirium and stupor; also with pain in the nape of the neck, loins, epigastrium, and lower extremities, severe pain on movement of the cervical or spinal muscles, and perhaps tetanus, an anxious face, mydriasis, and sometimes diplopia, and a low muttering delirium. There is cutaneous hyperæsthesia; and between the first day and the third there is a macular eruption, at first red, subsequently purple. The pulse, slow at first, becomes irregular and rapid; the breathing is rapid, the stomach irritable; the spleen may enlarge; the bowels are constipated at first, afterward relaxed. MERCUROUS, adj. Mu⁸rk'u²r-u³s. Fr., mercureux. It., mercuroso. Containing mercury as a univalent radicle. M. chloride, Hg_2Cl_2, is an example, where Hg_2 apparently takes the place of only two atoms of hydrogen. In reality, however, mercury is probably a bivalent radicle in these compounds, the structural formula of the above-mentioned compound being Cl — Hg — Hg — Cl. [B, 3.] For the compounds, see under MERCURY.

MERCUROUS-AMMONIUM, n. Mu⁸r'ku²-ru³s-a²m-mo'ni²-u³m. Lat., mercuroso-ammonium. A bivalent radicle, formed by substituting two atoms of univalent mercury (or, more strictly, a double atom of bivalent mercury — Hg — Hg —) for two atoms of hydrogen in a double molecule of ammonium, $\left\{ \begin{matrix} NH_3Hg \\ NH_3Hg \end{matrix} \right\} =$ $(NH_3)_2Hg_2''$. [B, 3.]—Chloride of m.-a. A black powder, $(NH_3)_2Hg_2Cl_2$. [B, 3.]

MERCURPHOSPHONIUM (Lat.), n. n. Mu⁸rk(me²rk)-u²r-(u⁴r)-fo²s-fon'i²-u³m(u⁴m). A radicle consisting of phosphonium in which 2 atoms of hydrogen are replaced by an atom of mercury. [B.]

MERCURY, n. Mu⁸rk'u²-ri². Gr., ὑδράργυρος (1st def.). Lat., hydrargyrum [U. S. Ph.] (1st def.), mercurius (1st def.). Fr., mercure (1st and 2d def's). Ger., Merkur (1st def.), Mercur (1st def.), Quecksilber (1st def.). It., Sp., mercurio (1st def.). 1. Quicksilver; a bivalent liquid metallic element, known to the ancients, of silvery color and metallic lustre. At about −40° C. it freezes into a ductile and malleable solid like tin, and it also crystallizes at low temperatures. It boils above 350° C. and volatilizes to a certain extent at ordinary temperatures. It occurs free, and also combined with sulphur (in cinnabar), with chlorine, and with iodine. Sp. gr., 13·594 to 13·595. Atomic weight, 199·7. Symbol, Hg. By the alchemists the term m. was applied not only to the metal, but also to a supposititious mystical principle or essence of which, apparently, ordinary m. was regarded as one of the manifestations; and also to the essence or subtle principle of any body whatever. Cf. MERCURIUS vegetabilium. [B.] 2. See MERCURIALIS and MERCURIALIS perennis. 3. A provincial term for Rhus toxicodendron.—Acid solution of nitrate of mercury [Br. Ph.]. Fr., ammoniure (ou chloramidure, ou oxychlorure ammoniacal) de mercure, lait mercuriel, mercure précipité blanc. Ger., weisses Quecksilberpräcipitat, Quecksilberchloridamid. White precipitate; chloride of mercuric ammonium, a compound of mercuric chloride with ammonium, $NH_2.HgCl$, prepared by precipitating a solution of corrosive sublimate with aqua ammoniæ. It occurs in the form of white pulverulent fragments, or as a white powder devoid of taste and odor and insoluble in water and in alcohol. [B.] It is used locally in various skin diseases, especially eczema, in blepharitis, and in chronic conjunctivitis. Cf. METRIC, adj. Me^{2}t′ri^{2}k. Gr., μετρικός (from μέτρον, a measure). Lat., metricus. Based on the metre as a unit of measurement. [α, 17.]—M. system. A decimal system of weights and measures adopted in France in 1799 and subsequently in many other countries, and now generally recognized and employed as the most convenient for use in scientific investigation. The unit of the system is the metre (Fr., mètre). a measure of length equivalent to 39·370 inches, designed to be (and being very nearly) the ten-millionth part of the distance from the pole to the equator as measured on the meridian of Paris. The decimal multiples of this and the other units are expressed by the use of prefixes from the Greek, and the submultiples by prefixes from the Latin. Thus, 10, 100, and 1,000 metres are designated, respectively, the decametre, hectometre, and kilometre (1,093·6 yards or 0·621 mile), while $\frac{1}{10}$, $\frac{1}{100}$, and $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the metre are the decimetre, centimetre, and millimetre (0·03937 or about $\frac{10}{254}$ of an inch). The thousandth part of the millimetre has been called the micron or micromillimetre. The unit of superficial measure is the are, a square having a side of a decametre, or 10 metres. It is equivalent to 119·60 yards, and the hectare is 2·471 acres. The unit of capacity is the litre, a cube having a side of a decimetre, or $\frac{1}{10}$ of a metre. It is equivalent to 61·027 cubic inches, or 1·761 imperial pints. The unit of weight is the gramme, which is regarded as the thousandth part of the weight of a litre of distilled water at its maximum density. It is equivalent to 15·43235 grains troy, and the kilogramme is 15432·35 grains, or 2·2046 lbs. av., the pound avoirdupois being 453·6 grammes. [α, 48.]

These teleutospores, germinating in the spring, produce a promycelium the branches of which bear sporidia, the germ-tube of which are unable to enter the stomata of the leaves of grasses. The sporidia are wafted by the wind to the barberry and perhaps other plants, where they produce hyphæ which, penetrating the stomata, form a mycelium that eventually bursts through the epidermis and forms cluster-cups (æcidium fruits ; see ÆCIDIUM berberidis) containing multitudes of yellowish spores. These germinate by emitting tubes, which, if the spores are conveyed to a grass plant, enter the leaf through the stomata, and form a new mycelium that after a time produces nest-like patches at the surface.
